Interfaith Worker Justice Summer Internship

Explore the connections between faith and social justice

The Interfaith Worker Justice Summer Internship is a ten-week program for undergraduate students who want to be active in the worker justice movement. Through hands-on experiences, interns will advocate for the right of all people to be treated with dignity in their work. Interns are placed at interfaith committees or workers' centers across the country, where their responsibilities can include outreach to the religious community on labor issues, interviewing workers' and business leaders, participating in local and national campaigns, and promoting public policy.

“Each person has dignity, whether they are a fast food worker or the president of a company, because they are a child of God.”
